An ISIS propaganda website on the dark web has been hacked and replaced with an advert for a service selling prozac and viagra tablets which told extremists to 'calm down.'

The site for the terror group appeared on the Tor browser of the dark web last week in a bid to get extremists to join up.

However, less than a week later, the site had been hacked and visitors to the page were greeted with a message for the medication.

It read: 'Too much ISIS. Enhance your calm. Too many people are into this ISIS-stuff. Please gaze upon this lovely ad so we can upgrade our infrastructure to give you ISIS content you all so desperately crave.'

According to the IBT, the website was taken down by Ghost Security Group, an independent counter-terrorism network.

It is believed to be the first time that a hacking group have taken down a website on the dark web.

The screenshot shows a dark web browser interface with a single tab open. The page title is "Too Much ISIS". Below the title, there is a message: "Enhance your calm. Too many people are into this ISIS-stuff. Please gaze upon this lovely ad so we can upgrade our infrastructure to give you ISIS content you all so desperately crave." At the top left of the page, there is an advertisement for "CoinRx.com Online Pharmacy". The ad features the text "We accept Litecoin, Bitcoin & Dogecoin" and "No prescription required". To the right of this text is a blue button with the text "FIND YOUR RX NOW" and a right-pointing arrow. The rest of the page is mostly blank white space.
